the work, while the set--consisting mainly of empty portrait frames--economically portrays the grandeur of the Mannon family estate.

O'Neill's four-hour play is about the emotional scars of those who survive a war--and how those who appear to be the victors often must endure punishment worse than death. This idea is also addressed, albeit indirectly, in a work entitled Agents and Assets, a play that takes place in the aftermath of a particular battle in the current War on Drugs.

Right now the Global War on Terror is stealing some of the War on Drugs' thunder, but this play--staged by the innovative troupe known as the Los Angeles Poverty Department--makes it clear that these two conflicts are closely related.

Agents and Assets is a theatrical reenactment of a Congressional Hearing into the CIA's alleged involvement in cocaine trafficking during the late 1980's. Besides a dramatis personae that has relevance today (Porter Goss and Nancy Pelosi are but a few of the "characters" in this play), Agents and Assets also stars a cast that is made up entirely of homeless or formerly homeless actors.

Having the lawmakers played by people who have probably suffered from the policies enacted by the characters that they're portraying is a brilliant coup de theatre; but more striking are the words themselves, which are reportedly quoted verbatim from the congressional record. What these words make clear--regardless of who's speaking them--is that the failures of the War on Drugs (committed by multiple administrations of both parties) are woefully being repeated today in the War on Terror.
by John Malpede who is celebrating his 20th year as the guiding force behind the Los Angeles Poverty Department, a truly unique part of the Southern California theater scene. This production is as timely and rough as O'Neill's take on the Civil War is timeless and polished; but both works, while hardly the dramatic equivalent of beach reading, are worthy Memorial Day activities as they both display the power of real, live theater as well as the cost of real, live wars.

Agents and Assets will be performed once more this Sunday at Compton Community College. (For tickets to Angels and Agents, call 213-413-1077.) Mourning Becomes Electra runs through this Sunday at the historic Masonic Temple Building in Glendale.

This is James Taylor with Theatre Talk for KCRW.
